CAN "UNITED NATIONS" BE TAUGHT?

*A Central, East and Southeast European Regional Colloquium on Innovative Techniques for

Rationale and Objectives of the Colloquium:

As Global Issues become more and more topical on the political agenda of any country in the world and as the United Nations system is within the existing global system of international relations the central institutional framework for global governance responds to global challenges (like e.g. the ongoing UNFCCC climate change negotiations as the process to coordinate globally climate change mitigation and adaptation measures or the Millennium Development Goals as a shared global vision for development agreed upon in the UN Millennium Declaration, etc.), it is important that there are developed appropriate human capacities in each country with the knowledge on the functioning of the UN system in order to enable all relevant stakeholders to contribute to the success of efforts of the international community to address global challenges and in order to enable countries to defend their interests according to the rules of play.

As the issues confronting the world have become more complicated, new teaching techniques are required to convey the complexity of the problems and the diversity of possible outcomes. In this context higher/tertiary education plays a key role and obviously there are huge potentials for mutual learning in addressing these human resources development issues in an international/regional setting.

But how can United Nations subjects best be addressed at Universities? There are emerging interesting new approaches of teaching UN related subjects through case teaching, structured debates, simulations, role play, experiential learning, using film and new media, use of information technology, google maps and electronic resources (available from UN agencies) and wiki-portals. Experiences will be exchanged about inter-active teaching techniques with the hope that a network of teachers and a compendium of effective activities be established.

Therefore, with this colloquium the organizers want to

- better understand who is doing what in the field of United Nations studies in Central, Eastern and Southeastern Europe
- identify and discuss innovative initiatives on teaching about the UN system
- contribute to regional cooperation

Expected concrete outcomes of the colloquium are

- a compendium/handbook on “Innovative Techniques/Approaches in Teaching about the UN System” that should be published in the “favorita papers” book series of Diplomatic Academy in Vienna
- project initiatives for regional cooperation in UN studies / teacher training and development of a website
